This is a picture of our school trip to Kyoto. When the picture was taken we were visiting Ginkaku-ji. You can see it in the picture, behind Ken and Akira.

There are eight of us in the picture. Ken is standing between Mark and Akira. Mark is an exchange student from America. The other boy is called Nobuo. I don't know him very well. I'm sitting in front of him, in the left-hand corner of the picture. Next to me is my best friend, Mika, and on the other side of her is Yumi. She sits next to me in class. She has very beautiful hair. The other person in the picture is her friend Eri.

We had a great day after the picture was taken. We visited some shrines and shops and we went to a restaurant and had lunch. When we were at the restaurant, one of the waitresses tried to speak English to Mark. Her English was so bad that he couldn't understand her.

I've kept the picture because Mark has returned to America now and we don't see him any more. I hope he is fine in America.

People played many kinds of games a long time ago. Today we still play some of them, but people have forgotten other games.

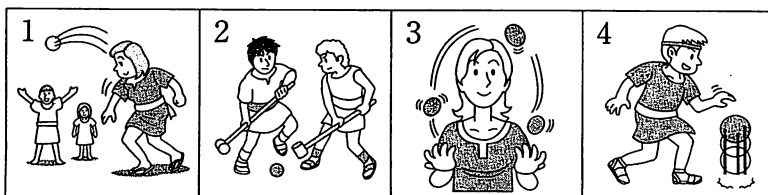

Ball games have been popular for thousands of years. There are pictures of both boys and girls throwing balls to one another, and of boys in old Athens playing a game with sticks and a ball. On a wall made about 2000 years ago in Athens, you can see a girl throwing three balls.

At that time, people also played marbles with small balls made of clay. Glass marbles were not invented until much later. You can still buy clay marbles, but it is difficult. We don't know how to play them. Probably they played the same games of marbles that we know today. In one game, you throw marbles at another marble, a wall, or into a hole. In another game, you throw marbles at marbles in a circle and then try to get them out of the circle.
